A metric, or "expected goals", attributed to a player or team in football and represents the probability of a goal being converted. Although the concept of xG has been developed by statisticians and specialists, the term itself is popularized by the company and website of football analytics, StatsBomb. StatsBomb was founded in 2015 by Ted Knutson, a statistician and analyst of American football. Knutson had previously worked in the analytics department of Tottenham Hotspur and Brentford FC, where he applied various advanced analytics techniques to help players and teams. Under Knutson's leadership, StatsBomb began to develop and promote the use of statistical techniques in football, including xG. Since then, xG has become a metric increasingly accepted and widely used in football, not only as a tool for analysis of player and team performance, but also as a benchmark for evaluating performance. The Estádio Beira-Rio was constructed in 1969, and was named Estádio João Pacheco da Silva in 1974 in honor of one of the club's prominent directors of Sport Club Internacional. In 1996, the club entered a severe financial crisis and was forced to sell to the United States. The process of returning the state of Rio Grande do Sul to the club was a long and difficult one, but it was eventually successful. Porto Alegre 2010. A history of things, a good example, but not the most important.
